THE BENEFITS BALANCING ACT: Employers hold the line on health benefits

Employees increasingly expect digital convenience, human guidance and clearer help choosing coverage that best fits their needs. As the competition for talent intensifies, organizations continue to expand their benefits programs despite absorbing higher costs in 2026. However, more financial responsibility has shifted to employees while employers try to meet growing expectations for easier access to benefits and more personalized support.

More than two-thirds (70%) of large size employers said their benefits costs increased during the past year, while 51% reported a rise in claims. Among organizations reporting higher costs, more than one-third of large size employers said the increase has constrained their ability to offer bonuses and higher-quality benefits. Others reported a shift toward marginally enhancing their benefits offerings.

Health insurance wasn't designed to help cover everything you may encounter during an illness or accident. The Aflac WorkForces Report reveals a growing demand for comprehensive health coverage and supplemental insurance as valuable components of a benefits package. These offerings can help with rising medical costs and provide employees with added peace of mind by helping to reduce financial stress when needed most.
